Reading this book

Each chapter offers a devotional reading and a response page with questions, a practical exercise, and prayer. Read the Bible references in your preferred translation. The discussion paraphrases biblical ideas; it does not present invented words as quotations from Jesus. Prayers and illustrative situations are original devotional writing.

The title uses “soulmate” as an everyday word for a deeply loving partner. It does not claim that Scripture promises everyone a single predestined romantic match or a particular date of marriage. Discernment, mutual choice, and faithful conduct remain essential.

Adapt the questions to your circumstances. You may answer privately, discuss them with a trusted person, or revisit them later. You do not need to disclose painful history to participate. If you are in danger, prioritize safety and appropriate support; relationship exercises are not a substitute for protection.

Introduction

A hopeful heart with open eyes

The hope of meeting a soulmate can hold many desires at once. You may want someone who listens without rushing, notices when you are quiet, and stays interested in the ordinary details of your life. You may imagine praying together, sharing a home, or growing old with a person whose presence feels familiar and dear.

These hopes deserve tenderness. They also deserve truth. A relationship cannot carry every need for belonging, repair every wound, or remove the uncertainty of being human. When we ask a partner to become our entire source of meaning, love grows heavy with expectations no person can meet. Christ invites us into a larger life in which romantic love can be a gift without becoming our god.

In Matthew 22:37-40, Jesus places love for God and love for neighbor at the center of faithful living. This teaching does not provide a formula for finding a spouse. It does offer a direction for the person we become and the way we treat anyone we hope to love. A promising relationship should have room for conscience, mutual dignity, and care that reaches beyond the couple.

This book asks you to hold hope and discernment together. Pray for companionship if that is your desire. Notice character over time. Learn to communicate without manipulation. Protect your freedom to say yes or no, and honor that freedom in another person. A declaration of destiny cannot replace their consent or excuse conduct that causes harm.

Your present life matters too. Singleness is not evidence that God has forgotten you, and marriage is not proof that someone has reached a higher spiritual rank. You can practice love through friendship, service, family, and community now. If a partnership grows, let it join a life already being lived with care. You are more than a future relationship status.

1 Honoring the desire for companionship

Bringing longing to God without shame

There are evenings when companionship feels less like a grand dream and more like wanting someone to ask how your day went. You may enjoy your independence and still wish for closeness. You may have a full life and still feel the empty place beside you at a celebration. Gratitude for what you have does not require denying what you hope for.

The creation account in Genesis 2:18-24 presents companionship as a meaningful human good. We can honor that goodness without turning the passage into a promise that every reader will marry. Desire is not a contract with the future. It is something we may bring honestly before God while remaining open to the particular shape our lives will take.

Jesus invites his hearers to ask the Father in Matthew 7:7-11. The passage encourages trust in God's goodness; it does not authorize treating another person as an object we can obtain through sufficient prayer. You may ask for a loving partnership, for opportunities to meet people, and for wisdom when a relationship begins. You can also ask for strength to live well while the answer remains unclear.

Longing becomes harder to carry when it is mixed with comparison. A friend's engagement can feel like a verdict on your own life. Someone else's happiness may stir genuine joy and private grief in the same moment. Instead of condemning yourself for that complexity, acknowledge it. You can celebrate a friend without pretending the occasion costs you nothing.

Give your desire enough room to be spoken, but do not let it occupy every room. Keep friendships alive. Make plans that are meaningful whether or not romance arrives. Accept invitations that interest you, and decline pressure that does not. A hopeful life includes the future while continuing to inhabit the present. God can hear your desire without asking you to put all living on hold.

Holding hope gently

Understand what you are asking for

When you imagine a partner, what experience do you most desire: companionship, affection, shared faith, a family, or being understood? Describe it concretely. Distinguishing these needs can help you see which belong particularly to romance and which may also be nourished through friendship and community.

What comparison makes your own life feel smaller? Consider whether you know the whole story of the relationship you admire. Let another person's joy remain theirs without using it to measure your worth.

One faithful response

Write a prayer that names your desire for companionship without setting a deadline or naming someone who has not freely chosen a relationship with you. Then choose one meaningful activity for your current life. Make the plan now. Hope can remain open while the present receives your attention.

A prayer for an honest longing

Father, I bring you my desire to share life with someone. You know the ordinary moments when that desire feels sharp. Please guide me toward relationships marked by kindness and truth. Give me courage to meet people with openness and wisdom to recognize when a connection is not right.

Jesus, protect me from turning comparison into a judgment against myself. Help me celebrate others without concealing my own sadness from you. Let my hope remain tender without becoming desperate. Bless the friendships and responsibilities already entrusted to me. Teach me to receive the life I have while honestly asking for the companionship I desire. Amen.
